Not a man or a gun has left Verdun, says Berlin, denying withdrawals.

That's right. And a majority of them never will.

"Pretoria, Ill., with the mercury at 101."

We should suppose she would be.

"Whales seen off the coast," says a newspaper heading.

But we haven't heard of any bather being Jonah enough to be swallowed up by one.

Holland has issued an orange book.

And Belgium remarked some time ago that Germany had handed her a lemon.

A man name Coffin has given $50,000 to the Presidential election.

With that amount to spend in a portion of a State the affair ought not to be a funeral.

Mr. Ford's attention is called to the way in which the Allies are seeking to get the Germans out of the trenches before Christmas.

Will he offer his support to the movement.

It is said that about as many are overcome with the eats as with the heat these warm days.

The war is two years and one week old—two years and one week too old.

And now a professor says man is descended from a shark.

We should worry so long as we don't descend or submerge with it.

Lord Derby would like to see the war end at Berlin.

Doubtless Kaiser Bill would like to move an amendment by substituting London for Berlin.

"Flat feet never keep men out of politics," says an exchange.

Neither do flat heads.

Do As We Say!

NOT AS WE DO !

At the present time Calgary is putting up a vigorous kick against the mail-order houses, and advising Calgarians to spend their dollars with Calgary merchants. That's good horse sense. But—and here's where the joke comes in—the following clipping is taken from one of the Calgary merchant's advertisement which appeared in one of the Calgary newspapers a few days ago :

TO OUT-OF-TOWN CUSTOMERS

Write for our Mail-Order Catalogue, containing free freight terms, special values and great economies.

We presume Calgary is after the other fellows, but at the same time says, "Do as we say, but not as we do." Its own merchants can use the mail-order catalogues and grab all they can from the country merchant; and we guess all that the Calgary press says against the outside mail-order houses will apply with equal force to its own mail-order houses. It's a poor rule that doesn't work both ways.

The Cost in Cash

SOME STUPENDOUS FIGURES

Some interesting figures are printed in a pamphlet issued by a New York bank concerning the cost of the great war. During the first year of the war, up to Aug. 1st, 1915, the total expenditure was approximately seventeen and a half billion dollars. In the second year, ending August 1st, 1916, the expenditure was twenty-eight billions. These figures do not represent the loss of assets through the destruction of cities, railways, ships, factories, highways and other utilities. They comprise simply the expenditure of carrying on hostilities.

Had the war stopped at the end of the second year the cost of it as shown in the above figures would represent four times the total deposits in the national banks of the United States. It would represent a sum six times greater than the cost of the civil war; 120 times the cost of the Panama canal and more than twenty times the cost of the South African war.

Great Britain is now spending twenty-five millions of dollars a day, according to Reginald Mc-Kenna. France is spending eighteen millions a day, according to her finance minister. Russia is spending fifteen and a half millions a day and Italy is spending five millions a day; so that the Entente Allies are spending $63,000,000 a day.

Germany, according to her minister of finance, is spending sixteen millions a day. Her allies are spending eleven millions a day combined, making a total for that side of twenty-seven millions.

Great Britain is spending more money on the war up to the present time than any other single contestant. Great Britain has also loaned to her allies and neutrals about two and a half billion dollars since the war began.

These figures are so large that they hardly mean anything to the average person. However, anyone who wants to do so may spend quite a lot of time in computing how far the money would reach if laid in dollar bills side by side, or how high a pile it would make, or how many car-loads it would fill, or any one of a multitude of other fascinating forms of calculation.

ARTHUR H. YEO PASSES AWAY

The death of Sergt. Arthur Henry Yeo of the 187th battalion occurred this morning at the general hospital of typhoid. Sergt. Yeo was 22 years old and was a native of England, his home being The Crescent, Windsor Park, London.

The funeral will be a military one and will take place at 10:30 tomorrow morning from the undertaking parlors of Harrison & Foster. The interment will be in the Union cemetery in this city.

The above paragraph from the Thursday Calgary Herald will be read with deep regret by the many Chinook friends of the late Sergt. Arthur H. Yeo. The deceased, who was well known and highly respected by a large circle of friends, has a homestead a few miles north of Chinook. He was a well educated young man, and came from a good home in London, England. When the war first broke out, he offered his services among the first of the recruits, but the battalion he at that time had chosen was fully recruited when his application was made. Later, however, he could not resist his country's call, and when the 175th batt.
was formed, he joined that batt.
as a private, but later was transferred to the 187th, with the rank of sergeant, and was expecting to go to the front any time now, but the grim reaper stepped in ahead and claimed him as a victim before the embarkation for overseas took place. With the death of the deceased, two of Chinook's recruits have died without going to the front, Auty Hawkshaw being the first. The deceased Arthur H. Yeo has made the supreme sacrifice for his country, although not permitted to die the hero in the trenches, and his untimely death is greatly regretted by a wide circle of friends here. The parents at home and the family, who, not to be, were looking forward to seeing "their boy" again before going to the front, has the sympathy of the friends

Then Lord Eastling, thinking there was nothing to be gained by evasion of the truth, answered simply—

"I'm following you because I believe that you have been tampering with Mrs. Finchend's pearls, and that you have been trying to get rid of the property you have annexed."

It cost the brother-in-law of Paul Payne a moment's effort to say this, since he was strung up to the point of death, but it was done, and was such a loss as that experienced at One Court, followed by this hurried journey up to town on the part of Paul, must be connected with the ill-doings of his sister's husband.

For a moment his bluntness took Paul's breath away. Then he said suddenly—

"You've behaved like a fool before. I sincerely know how to qualify your conduct now. You are a vile scoundrel."

"Well, I'll repeat what I've said to fore any one you like, and you can take proceedings for slander," said Lord Eastling steadily.

Paul shivered at his words.

"You know I can't do that. If you have no sense of noblesse oblige, I must, have, if only for my wife's sake."

The mention of his sister irritated Lord Eastling afresh.

"For her sake you might, I should think, have kept away from fresh trouble."

Seeing that he could not get rid of him, Paul changed his tone, and began to laugh.

"Lord Eastling," he said, "this is really absurd, and we must put a stop to it. Come along with me and if you are not satisfied that my proceedings are wholly correct, why I'll give you leave to hand me over to the police on any charge you please."

As he spoke, he put his hand through Lord Eastling's arm, and dragged him to a taxi, which they entered together.

"I've come up," he explained, as he gave a direction to the driver, "to call on my tailor, and to get a few things that I want, so if you are bored with me, you may leave yourself to your own knowledge."

Lord Eastling said nothing. He was in an awkward predicament, quite believing his brother-in-law to be involved in the secret of the pearls, but not so sure that he was right in having accused him.

He recognized the fact that he himself was even more in need of advice than his brother-in-law, and it occurred to his mind that he would take the first opportunity of going to a solicitor and unbending himself to him.

In the meantime he resolved that he would accept Payne's challenge, and at least make it impossible for his brother-in-law to carry on the fight.

In the meantime, however, the situation was a delicate one. It is difficult to keep up a conversation on indifferent topics with a man whom you have accused of being your own spy, and who has practically replied to that accusation by treating you as a fool.

It was better to make the attempt, so Lord Eastling felt, as he sat back in the cab and let it to his companion to make conversation.

This task seemed quite easy to a man of the resource of Paul Payne. He began to discuss the names of the candidates in the coming election, and spoke so well on the subject that he interested the younger man against himself.

Again and again Lord Eastling had to remind himself that he was dealing with a man who wanted a good deal of stitching; for Paul, as he appeared to him, was not in what he said, contrived to exercise a kind of fascination on his hearer.

They got out at a tailor's, suggested by Paul, who largely invited his companion to come along into the premises. Lord Eastling doggedly accepted the invitation, and not only went with his brother-in-law to the tailors, but also, when the two orders, but kept a sharp eye upon the handsome Paul throughout the proceedings at each of the places where they called.

At the same time Lord Eastling thought it prudent to appear to have forgotten the object of his own mission; he encouraged Paul to talk, showed his own interest in the topics discussed, and did his best to seem at ease.

After a couple of hours Paul suggested that they should go down to the downtown hotel in the city of St. Paul, and have luncheon, and Lord Eastling agreeing, they went together.

Here, the younger man, keenly on the alert in spite of his pretence of having been a good listener, noted that the two men, who were sitting at one of the tables, glanced up as Paul entered, and immediately looked at each other, while the two others, dressed in smart clothes, and a sporting cut, although they did not appear quite at ease in them. Lord Eastling took care not to appear to notice them, but presently he saw Paul looking out on the strength of the margin of the hill of fare.

He went on talking as he did so, and the action would have passed to his brother-in-law, had not the recognition of a man who is waiting for his luncheon and finds himself with a pencil in his hand.

Lord Eastling watched the card as though it were the end of the party, but when he tried to reach it, Paul, still holding it stretched his arm out, got another card from an unoccupied table, and handed it to his companion in the most innocent manner in the world.

Lord Eastling went on talking, but kept his eyes and ears open.

A few minutes later, one of the two men at other tables called to the waiter to bring them the menu, and while he answered his companion's questions, handed to the waiter the edge of which he had been writing.

Lord Eastling watched the card as the waiter carried it to the two men, watched them as they passed it from his presence, these three, the two men in the sporting clothes and his brother-in-law, who have been lunching at the same table.

He was right.

For the two men were Brady Game and Bill Evans, and that had got a telegram from Paul that morning making an appointment at the restaurant for two o'clock.

CATERPILLAR XII

Paul was a very asthmatic young man, and his thin, weak appearance did not suggest that he was healthy. But Lord Eastling felt the need of a perfectly clear head, and he mistrusted the reason of his brother-in-law's hospitalization.

Presently, Paul's face of tall amplitude, and his usual amiable manner gradually changed to one of settled mordosity.

It was evident that he began to recognize the fact that he was not an unworthy antagonist as he had supposed. It was Lord Eastling's turn to be civil and cheerful, and to keep the talk going.

In the meantime he noted that the two men at the other table were silent and watchful.

Paul leaned forward on his elbows and asked—

"Don't you think?" he said, "this is really absurd, and we must put a stop to it. Come along with me and if you are not satisfied that my proceedings are wholly correct, why I'll give you leave to hand me over to the police on any charge you please."

Lord Eastling hesitated.

"Well, any man must be the best judge of his position I am to take," he said at last slowly.

"Quite so; but you will have to make up your mind definitely, by and by, to whom it is to be peace or war between us."

What the Naval Battle Taught the United States

"Up to the time of the great Anglo-German battle in the North Sea of the coast of Jutland naval opinion was divided as to whether the submarine had perhaps made the battleship archaic, and as out of place in modern warfare as the old-fashioned four-horse stage coach is in transportation.

In the meantime, however, the situation was a delicate one. It is difficult to keep up a conversation on indifferent topics with a man whom you have accused of being your own spy, and who has practically replied to that accusation by treating you as a fool.

Lord Eastling watched the card as the waiter carried it to the two men, watched them as they passed it from his presence, these three, the two men in the sporting clothes and his brother-in-law, who have been lunching at the same table.

He was right.

For the two men were Brady Game and Bill Evans, and that had got a telegram from Paul that morning making an appointment at the restaurant for two o'clock.

No Reason to Believe that the Cannibalism in Europe Effects
the Weather Here

In answer to a query as to whether the extraordinary weather in any way has been brought about by the cannibalism in Europe, the following statement has been made by the Meteorological Office at London:

"Historical records indicate the me-

Potash From Bananas

Probable Collapse of Germany's Scheme to Penalize Britain

As up to the present Germany through her mines of most pure materials has had a monopoly of which both Great Britain and the United States have depended to a large extent for manufacturing purposes, it has been accepted as inevitable by Germany that in the course of the war, the government would inflict so heavy a tax upon its import; that it would recuperate its exhausted exchequer from this source alone. Just as possible that the fall of Germany will not all come true. At any rate an interesting discovery has been made in England that may solve the problem of that country with regard to potash.

Dr. Hamilton's experiments with banana stalks to determine whether the fibre could be used for paper making. During the examination he noted that the stalks were sufficient to allay the cause of irritation on the skin, and this led him to examine it further, with the result that he found there was present a large quantity of potash, and practically no starch. This analysis has been confirmed by Dr. Hanley, of the Leeds University.

In fact the figures showed that the dried stalks of a single banana plant was as rich in potash as a ton of mutton known in the world. A "BARGAIN" WATCH CO., London, D.P.
